But the loyalty clause itself may also be restricting, and in many cases, recruits and applicants will have little recourse if they feel they are being targeted by recruiters because of their faith. At times, recruiters may do this subtly—those who dismiss the faith of applicants as unimportant to their ability to do the job may be expressing bias that is, once again, clear to an applicant. Such subtle prejudice may require a deeper level of investigation, and even if it doesn't, it may still damage the applicant's ability to obtain the job. The same may be said of another type of conduct that may be in violation of recruiting standards. FEMEN—an activist organization that fights for women's rights to speak freely and in public without being insulted or harassed—has been in the news for its activities in Ukraine and other countries, from protesting outside the U.S. embassy in Kiev to burning a photo of President Trump and Vice President Pence in Kazakhstan. FEMEN's anti-gender-role agenda has also caused some dissension among activist members, and activists at FEMEN's forum in Bălți, in Moldova, also caused some controversy with their actions. According to a report in The Daily Beast, some women who wanted to attend the forum claimed that female activists referred to them as “whores” and that they were accused of being “prostitutes.” After a complaint was filed with the forum organizers, the entire slate of speakers was cancelled. One of the invitees, Olena Bilozir, who protested in Ukraine that her rights to free speech had been violated because the state refuses to recognize her as a woman, said she was especially offended by the remarks made by activists who referred to women in the group as prostitutes. She believes that such comments are connected to a pervasive anti-femin
